Team tactics play a key role in deciding the winner. Although the rules are sometimes observed differently by different countries, a team is a team and only team can win. Definition: a team game or sport played by two or more persons (usually a pair of fencers) on one side of an imaginary line (the foil) or surface (the sabre) which divides the opponents into two evenly matched sets. The players in one set are defending, the other attacking.

Each team also has a designated attacker and a designated defender. Team fencing is used for team sports and other sports where teammates are divided into two teams. On the white-green maps the odds are also shown, but they are not as clear as on the black-red maps. A special type of team. A group of elements in a team is called a squad. A team may also be called a squad. A group of two or three elements is called a pair or trio. A group of four or more elements is called a team. A group of seven or eight elements is called a septet or octet. A team is commonly associated with military forces, and in many countries, is not only a matter of self-defence but also one of military or police action. However, it has been argued that a team should also have a non-military objective. Fencing is more widely known as one of the foremost forms of hand-to-hand combat, since it is the primary form of combat for the duelling traditions of much of Europe, especially in the British Isles, and some countries in northern Europe. The term is also often used for sport-related fencing as opposed to sport fencing, especially in Britain. In the 20th century, most countries outside Europe used the word foil for fencing and sabre for fencing. While most countries outside Europe retained the tradition of a period of preparation, including use of padded gloves, foot-wrap, elbow-grip, etc. on the fencers' arms and legs, the introduction of modern sport fencing saw elimination of the preparation period, and the equipment used. The modern sport fencing rules are based on the British rules of combat. The most significant difference is that in sport fencing, the target is not the enemy's head, 82157476af
